The book examines the role of transnational corporations (TNCs) in the geography of international production and covers both theoretical and empirical aspects. In Part I it considers the integration role of TNCs; Part II discusses business networks from both empirical and theoretical perspectives; Part III presents a theory based on TNCs’ strategies of organisational and locational fragmentation; Part IV considers TNCs’ role in the globalization process: it identifies the ICTs as the dominant cause (using Keynes’ notion of causa causans) of the process and draws theoretical and policy conclusions.
